New crop insurance aims to help small farms that supply locally riculture is rolling out a new insurance option specifically for agricultural producers with small farms who sell locally.

"The new Micro Farm policy simplifies record keeping and covers post-production costs like washing and value-added products," according to a USDA news release.

USDA's Risk Management Agency created the new policy based on research directed by the 2018 Farm Bill, and it includes feedback from produccommunities. The policy will be available beginning with the 2022 crop year.

"We are excited to offer this new coverage for producers who work to provide their communities with fresh and healthy food," RMA Acting Administrator Richard Flournoy said in the release. "USDA is focused on supporting local and regional food systems, and this new crop insurance policy is designed with this important sector of agriculture in mind.'

The new policy is offered through Whole-Farm Revenue Protection.

The Micro Farm policy is available to producers who have a farm operation that earns an average allowable revenue of $100,000 or less, or for carryover insureds, an average allowable revenue of $125,000 or less. RMA's research showed that 85% of producers who sell locally reported they made less than $75,000 in gross sales.

Corp. approved the Micro Farm policy in late September, and additional details will be provided later this fall.

Crop insurance is sold and delivered solely through private crop insurance agents. A list of crop insurance agents is available at all USDA Service Centers and by going online to the RMA agent locator at www.rma.usda.gov.

In brief

Albany board leaves burning rules unchanged

The ordinance allowing Albany residents to burn rubbish remains unchanged after the village board considered the issue last week.

Board members sought input on the issue after it resurfaced recently, Village Clerk Laurie Keepers said in an email. The ordinance allows the burning of dry combustible rubbish in burn barrels, which sometimes causes complaints about odor from people burning "their actual garbage or plastics," Keepers said.

Eleven residents attended an Oct. 11 public hearing on the issue, with all in favor of continuing to allow burning, Keepers said. Eight people also provided written comments to the village board, with five in favor of burning and three against, she said.

After the hearing, board members deadlocked 3-3 over any changes to the burning ordinance and no changes were made, Keepers said. One board member was absent from the meeting.

Special education efforts hindered by high stress, sparse state funding

By Heather Graves and Lea Kopke THE PRESS TIMES

From the time she wakes up in the morning until the time she goes to bed, Green Bay parent Denise Seibert's life centers around her son, Tyler. At just two weeks old, Tyler was diagnosed with fragile X syndrome, a genetic condition that causes a range of developmental problems, including learning disabilities and cognitive impairment.

"I carry a genetic disorder, an autism spectrum genetic disorder, so we had my son tested very early, right after I had him," Seibert said. "I also have a brother who is a couple years younger than me who has (the same condition). So this has kind of been a lifetime experience with people with disabilities and kind of being in that world and mentality."

Seibert said because of overworked school district staff, she has had to take the lead in suggesting services that Tyler needs as spelled out in his individualized education plan, or believe the district has a lot of good intentions," she said. "The teachers, paraprofessionals and therapists truly care about the kids and the progress they make each year. But, the staff in the district seem stretched thin. Most of my son's team is visiting multiple schools every day to see multiple children for services. They all seem overwhelmed with workload and have less time to spend actually working with the kids on IEP goals.'

For parents and teachers, raising and educating a special-needs child can be all-consuming. Parents struggle to care and advocate for their children, who may have significant health, educational and behavior challenges. And teachers face tough working conditions that prompt many of them to switch districts or leave special education, creating a shortage of qualified educators.

Federal and state mandates require that public school districts in Wisconsin provide all of the special education services a student needs. Roughly 14% of students in Wisconsin are classified as having special needs, which include physical, intellectual, cognitive, emotional and learning disabilities.

But over the past five decades, state funding support for special education has declined precipitously. That forces districts — which must abide by revenue caps set by the state to take money from the regular education budget to pay for services they are legally obligated to provide to special ed students.

Last year, the Green Bay District transferred School more than $30 million from the general fund into the special ed fund, said Claudia Henrickson, student services director for the district.

She described it as a "vicious cycle."

"That is 30 million dollars that didn't go to the general education students that lowers your class sizes, gives them even more resources, things of that nature," she said.

See EFFORTS, Back Page

Berenice Lopez Sanchez and her 6-year-old son Armando are relatively new to the special education quagmire parents and their children face as they navigate a complex set of state and federal mandates. Sanchez says she is frustrated that her son cannot receive services primarily in Spanish at his Green Bay school.

cation staff in Wisconsin have roughly twice the turnover rate of other school staff, and districts report having a hard time filling those jobs. Polling by several disability rights advocacy groups also finds many parents of children with disabilities are dissatisfied with the way their children are educated.

Funding falls short

Meanwhile, special education funding from the state of Wisconsin has dropped over the past half century — hovering around 70% reimbursement in the 1970s to under 25% in 2018. That leaves an estimated $1 billion for districts to make up through local revenues.

Gov. Tony Evers' proposed budget called for an increase to 60% reimbursement. But the Republican-authored budget he signed in July includes just a 2% increase, bringing the reimbursement level to 30% by the budget's second year.

Green Bay Superintendent Steve Murley said some increase is better than no increase, but it doesn't fix the broken system.

"Anything short of 100% funding of special education

Data show that special edu- costs takes money out of our regular education classrooms and pits students and programs against each other," Murley said. "We already have an annual deficit for which we are required to rob the general fund to pay."

Forcing school districts to divert general funds to special education costs "has emerged as a major contributor to inequity in Wisconsin's school finance system," according to a 2019 Wisconsin Policy Forum issue brief. Since each district's share of special ed students varies widely, schools with more special ed students must divert more money from programs that serve the general student population.

The Menominee Indian School District saw the state's largest share of unreimbursed special ed costs in 2015-16, according to the Wisconsin Policy Forum: nearly 25% of the district's per pupil revenue limit.

State spending on special ed low

Across 50 states, there are many different ways special education funding is allocated. A reimbursement system, which is what Wisconsin does, is in the minority. According to the Education Commission of the States, as of 2019, Wisconsin was one of seven states with a reimbursement system.

Among the seven, Wisconsin had the lowest reimbursement rate at 28.18%. Some states with such systems, including Wyoming and Rhode Island, reimburse the full cost.

State Rep. Joel Kitchens, R-Sturgeon Bay, who cochaired the Blue Ribbon Commission on School Funding in 2018-19, said by law, districts are required to spend whatever is needed to provide services called for in a special ed student's IEP. Boosting funding does not necessarily provide more services for those students, Kitchens said, but it does help a district's bottom line.

Nevertheless, commission recommended a series of options, which would increase special education funding to cover as much as 60% of the cost.

method of delivery, which is in a general education classroom. Students can move into a more collaborative setting, where general education teachers sometimes co-teach with special education teachers or aides.

Students who require additional services may be pulled out of general education classrooms for specialized skill instruction or an alternative curriculum at points throughout the day.

To determine the resources a special education student needs, each student receives an individualized plan for learning, known as an IEP.

Patti Williams, an assistant director of special education at the Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction, said the 1975 federal Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) was enacted because students with disabilities were being excluded from public school classrooms.

But not all districts are prepared to offer services parents believe their children need. Berenice Lopez Sanchez said she often feels frustrated seeing her 6-year-old son Armando, who has autism, struggle with instruction offered only in English in his Green Bay school.

"He already knew Spanish before school, and he responds better in Spanish," she said. "So if you all of a sudden throw him into English, it's like starting all over again."

Education extends to age 21

Samantha Platkowski credits her daughter Hannah's academic success to her teachers. whom she described as creative and dedicated to student success.

Hannah Platkowski has Down syndrome and has spent 13 years in Green Bay's special education program. Although she is 19, because she has special needs, she is by law eligible for services until she is 21. Currently, Hannah is participating in a work experience job through her school at CP, a nonprofit that serves children and adults with disabilities.

Platkowski said out-of-thebox thinking by teachers over the years gave Hannah the extra support she needed to succeed.

Our daughter entered middle school unable to tie her shoes," Platkowski said. 'When our daughter asked to play basketball, her teacher collaborated with the coach and players, and the players helped Hannah learn to tie her shoes.'

And when she wanted to speak at her graduation, Platkowski said, teachers and staff at Green Bay West helped her write, revise and practice her speech.

High turnover, staff shortages

But Platkowski said she sees a lack of support for special education teachers, whose jobs are uniquely difficult.

"These are jobs that have a high rate of burn out, are highstress, high-anxiety and take an emotional and sometimes physical toll on the staff members," Platkowski said.

Jennifer Garceau, Howard-Suamico's student services director, said her district has a hard time filling openings for teachers and other special ed staff.

Jennifer Kammerud, director of the Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction's educator preparation and licensing department, said districts can apply for one-year emergency licenses to fill slots. Kammerud said in recent years there's been an upward trend in the number of such licenses issued each vear — but it's still not enough, districts say, to fill open posi-while enrollment continues to decline, the percentage of students with a known disability has increased. An estimated 14.2% of students in the 2020-'21 school year received special ed services, compared to 13.7% in 2016-'17.

The turnover rate for special education staff also is higher than for elementary education and other subject areas, according to data from DPI. In the 2015-'16 school year, 11.95% of special education staff left their jobs for another public school job, compared to 6.75% of elementary-level staff. Attrition - leaving the public school system altogether — is also higher for special ed teachers, 9.1% compared to 7.1% for elementary teachers.

That means one of every five special education teachers switched schools or left the public school system in the 2015-'16 school year.

Stacy Splittgerber has stuck it out for more than three decades helping Green Bay's youngest special education students. She is an early childhood teacher at Kennedy Elementary School, where she teaches children ages 3 to 6 with varying needs.

Splittgerber said student successes keep her motivated but the job is not easy.

"I can have a really bad couple months, and I can go home and be like, 'I'm out, this is my last year," she said. "And then there will be a day after that and there is a huge breakthrough with one of the students... It's in those moments when I know I've made a difference. That I know that I need to keep coming back, because they need me."

Wisconsin Watch's Dee J. Hall and Jim Malewitz contributed to this report. The full version of the Press Times' series on special education can be

ANASTASIA GEIGEL / PRESS TIMES Brodhead Index Denise Seibert says she spends all of her waking hours thinking about how to care for her son, Tyler, who has fragile X syndrome, which causes low muscle tone and significant learning disabilities. Seibert believes the special education staff at Tyler's Green Bay school have his best interests at heart, but they often appear to be stretched too thin.
